Albumen and yolk proteins in eggs of the domestic hen and the domestic fowl were isolated and investigated by means of electrophoresis in polyacrylamide gel. The antigens were found to be formed of different polypeptides. The relationship of antigens from eggs of the domestic fowl and the common chicken was established by means of the surface antigen exchange method. A quantitative and qualitative dependence of the antigens was found. The replacement of antigens from one species by the antigens of another species was shown in the reaction of antigen absorption. It was found that the antigens formed of completely different peptide chains with a high probability of their limited sequential relation are not formed in the eggs of different species. This suggests, that these antigens were not formed by the duplication of the same sequences of the egg-yolk.
